Monday Mag S and running

A court case, a controversial figure, a black Mormon, a bicentennial statue and a deadly disease are the first fruits of new Monday Magazine editors and writers this week as the first issue of the semester comes together. Working around the hassles of the first week of school, research, reporting and editing got underway smoothly to bring in these diversified stories. Sources ranged from bat caves to Fourth District Court. A Universe editor who does pet elephant imitations and wears a Stetson hat in the rain took a more serious stance to give Monday Magazine a personal glimpse into the life of Congressman Allan Howe. Richard Romney, a senior in Communications from Salt Lake City, served as an intern with the Deseret News Washington Bureau this summer, and through the BYU Political Science Department was able to spend a day with each of Utah's senators and Congressman Howe reveals a glimpse into the man behind the headlines and accusations. Romney's press acumen stems from a lengthy lively career in journalism, beginning with editorship of a junior high ne wspaper ("I remember staying up all night coloring the front page with magic markers"). Since then he has been a sports writer, copy editor and entertainment editor for various publications, including University of Utah's Daily Chronicle. His spontaneity won him an award for on-the-spot reporting. It also got him into some sticky situations.

man. The interview was easy and productive; "I only wish all interviews were that easy," he says ruefully.

A man with a master's degree from the University of Hawaii travelled to Spanish Fork to report on an accomplished sculptor and his new work. Michael Foley, author of the Father Esclante stature story, hails originally from Salt Lake City but has spent the years since his Samoan mission in the South Pacific; he has lived, worked, and studied in Hawaii, West Java, Polynesia and Micronesia, among others. "I already find Provo weather quite cold," he grins. His story on Avard Fairbanks stems from an interest sparked 15 years ago when Fairbanks spoke at a Youth Fireside Foley attended. "He's really a wonderful guy," asserts Foley," I enjoyed being involved with the article." He was a reporter with the Fort Campbell (Kentucky) Courier, and in five years of journalistic experience has had articles printed in national publications—including an article on transcendental meditation that was distributed to 3,600 cities. Besides the U.S., his writings have been in Asia, Europe and the Pacific Complete and careful research are his trademarks and he says, "You have to track down all the information and compile it—that's the fun of it."

A senior from Grass Valley, Calif., Donna has gained recognition for her persistence in uncovering names, dates and figures no one else had. In fact, when KSL called news sources to get the Four Seasons story, the sources referred them to "some student reporter at BYU who knows all about it." It was her work in this area, she contends, that got her a summer internship with the Deseret News. Shades of Woodward and Bernstein surround Donna's research as she searches court records and tracks down people "who just don't want to talk to me." But it isn't all controversy, she maintains—"Sometimes it's just plain boring."

"This is as good a first issue of the Monday Magazine as we've ever had," says Monday Magazine A dvisor Nelson Wadsworth. "We had eager people here ready and willing to work even before the semester began." Editor Rouviere is enthused about the future issues. "We want to keep it trendy and up-to-date," she says, "And explore a variety of subjects."

What does it take to get up every morning at 5:30 to run seven miles in the dark through the streets of Provo?

"Motivation," says Demitrio Cabanillas, freshman cross-country runner from Tamazula, Mexico.

If that's what it takes,

Demitrio certainly has it. He began distance running three and a half years ago and already has two Mexican national steeplechase championships and the Central American game's 1975 steeplechase crown under his belt. He also won the Deseret News Marathon this summer, the first marathon he

Along with most other young runners, Demitrio wants to run in the Moscow Olympics.

"I believe that anybody can run in the Moscow Olympics if they train hard. Many runners in the Montreal Olympics had trouble with injuries and had to drop out, but I think that I can train hard and be able to run in the Olympics," he says.

In addition to his electrical engineering classes and twenty hours a week with the BYU grounds crew, Demitrio runs an average of 18 miles a day. His high is 30 miles in one day. Escalante scuipture

Earlier on the morning of the 23rd, members of the Spanish Fork riding club will meet other horsemen representing numerous clubs from throughout the Southwest. The riders have been retracing portions of the Old Spanish Trail forged out by the Escalante group since last July. They will complete their journey at the unveiling ceremony.

Over two dozen activities, including marathon races, concerts and a BYU rodeo, will be staged, Carley says.

The unveiling ceremony, however, will be the focal point of the event.

Fairbanks was born in Provo in 1897, the son of John B. and Lillian Huish of Payson. His father was the artist/photographer for the Benjamin Cluff expedition, which went to South America from 1900-1902 for the city of Zarahemla. The young artist first received national recognition in 1910 in the form of a two-year scholarship to study in New York City. In 1918, he began his professional career with several statues and friezes for the Hawaii temple.

Today, three of his bronzes can be found in Statuary Hall, Washington, D.C. and another four marble busts of Abraham Lincoln are in the Ford Theater. His sculpture of the angel Moroni was recently placed on the spire of Robert Stevenson leans back in a chair in his office and stretches his legs out comfortably.

"It's been exciting," he says of his first four months of service as ASBYU Executive vice-president. "I've begun to realize my potential in meeting people and dealing with them in various situations."

There is a knock at the door. Stevenson jumps up and greets a friend. "You want to double tonight?" he asks. "It's a friend I have, her birthday. Okay, see you then."

The friend leaves, and Stevenson returns and breaks into a smile characterized by the manner in which the ends of his lips curl almost straight upward. He takes his place in the chair, drapes one leg over the other, and relaxes once again.

Selma, Ala., was in many ways a typical southern town in the fifties. It was hot and sultry in the summer, and the thunderheads formed high above, carried inland by the breeze up from the Gulf Coast. The coffee-colored Alabama River lolled its way through town on its way to a junction with the waters of Mobile Bay. The foliage, thick, lush and green.

Selma was the archetype of southern towns in other ways as well. There were segregated schools, buses, restaurants, and drinking fountains. (Stevenson recalls how horrified his mother was when, as a child, he took a sip of water from a "white only" fountain.) There was a wealthy side of town and a poor side. Robert Lee Stevenson grew up on the poor side.

"You really can't tell about the physical side of my life without telling about the spiritual, too," he says. The Mormon Church, Stevenson states, "is the center of my life." In fact, the church in part motivated him to run for office.

"My purpose, I feel, is to see what I can do for my people to bring them to the gospel," he says. "I knew I had to gain some position to have the authority so that they would listen," he adds frankly. "It's sad, but that's the way it is."

party leaders to support him. That support was not forthcoming.

"I think he made a mistake," said Gov. Calvin L. Rampton. "He can't be elected."

Sen. Frank Moss, D-Utah, said he was disappointed and would support a write-in candidate if one is chosen. Rep. Gunn McKay, D-Utah, said he still hoped Howe would drop out. An aide to McKay, James McConkie, said he would announce his own write-in candidacy Tuesday. Phyllis Frankel, party chairman in Howe's county, said she would resign if the party did not sponsor a write-in candidate.

Howe's name cannot be forced off the November ballot. He was unopposed when the filing deadline passed before his June 12 arrest. Republicans will name a candidate in the Sept. 14 primary election.

His wife beside him and a birthday cake on his desk, Howe called the decision "the most crucial decision of

Howe, who will be 49 Monday, went against political advice, public opinion polls and editorial opinion, saying he would "stand on my record of service and on my innocence in this unfortunate matter."

Howe was convicted twice, once in City Court and again in District Court on an automatic appeal, of trying to buy sex from two police decoy prostitutes. He admitted talking to the women, but said he was lured to the red-light district in the belief he was meeting someone who would take him to a political function.

He said Friday, "It was a mistake, as I have said many times before, to go down to that area of Salt Lake. I regret that mistake. To err is human, but to forgive is divine..."

Party leaders have said since his arrest that they felt his presence on the ticket would hurt other candidates. "I have said repeatedly that I know the people of Utah are fair, Howe said adding that he believes the campaign will be conducted on issues and that voters will decide on those issues.

Dan Marriott, one of the Republican hopefuls, said "I will continue to be silent regarding Mr. Howe's personal problems, and wage a campaign based strictly on the important issues."

Said Howe, "To withdraw now would go against not only my record and my innocence, but everything I believe in "."

only my record and my innocence, but everything I believe in....

He said that slightly more than half of 2,700 people who contacted his office since his last conviction told him to stay in the race.

"I will need money," Howe said, "and a lot of it."

Howe's announcement followed by two days the resignation from Congress of Rep. Wayne Hays, D-Ohio, involved in payroll-sex accusations. Asked about Hays, Howe said everyone must make an individual decision. Howe said he has not decided whether to appeal his convictions.

Church officials and Deseret Book Company.

The Story of the Latter-day Saints, according to Dr. Allen, will never take Essentials in Church History's place in its approach and contribution to Church history, but it does take advantage of the tremendous storehouse of information and research compiled in the last 20

The new book covers the events of Church history in a most interesting manner. It brings out the flavor of each era of Mormon history with such detail not to be found in other historical texts.

Most texts of Church history go a bruptly from major happening to major happening to major happening in a mild confusion in chronology of events and background. The Story of the Latter-day Saints treats LDS history as a smooth narrative detailed richly with background material. For example, the moving of the Smith family from New Hampshire to Palmyra, New York and the subsequent problems they encountered in building a permanent home tends to shed more light on the shaping influences of Joseph Smith's boyhood.

The book's reporting of the failure of the Kirtland' Safety Society takes advantage of new research and insight on the subject by other LDS historians. Essentials covered in the crisis minimally: while The Story of the Latter-day Saints goes to more detail.

Dr. Allen explains that in the writing of the new book, a positive balance was sought between showing the best side of Church history and the Apostates and antagonists of Mormonism frequently cast a negative connotation to events in Joseph Smith's life; for example, about the time Joseph received the gold plates from Moroni, he was involved in treasure-seeking schemes. The Story of the Latter-day Saints not only brings this out, but strikes a balance between negative and positive by pointing to human nature and the Prophet's boyhood follies.

For one who wants to learn Church history, but does not want to pay the price a multi-volume set would cost, The Story of the Latter-day Saints is a valuable solution.

"Everybody is tired of hearing whites tell blacks what it is like to be a black Mormon. It will take a black Mormon to tell the world what it is like to be a black Mormon."

After the elections, Stevenson gained that chance. As papers from coast to coast picked up the story, Stevenson forcefully and eloquently told his beliefs and feelings about being a member of the Church of Jesus Christ. It should have been his crowning moment, the chance to fulfill a dream. Ironically, Stevenson felt little elation, and an emptiness instead.

"After telling my story, say to the New York Times, I felt empty," Stevenson recalls. "I began to realize the election was not the end, but rather a steppingstone."

He leans forward a bit on his chair. "I'm tired of being a guest in my Father's house," he says bluntly.

Despite his awareness of the problem, Stevenson sees no easy solutions. "I don't know what to do about it, but I do know something needs to be done. It becomes spiritual hell when you have the spiritual acceptance but not the social."

Stevenson's social life is "great," and in part he credits his attitude for it. "I don't consider myself different from any other person."

"I feel the Lord has more for me...whether it is politics, or otherwise," Stevenson reflects.

"There's more to my life. I feel the Lord has more for me... whether it is in politics, or otherwise." One area Stevenson sees himself as a potential catalyst is in gaining greater social acceptance of the black within the Mormon Church.

"Black people are arriving, but nobody knows it," Stevenson said. In the Mormon Church, he said, "Blacks are treated as spiritual brothers and sisters," but have not achieved social equity in the sight of many members. "Black people have to be physically as well as socially accepted. Mormons haven't come to the point where they can combine the spiritual and the social bases."

Robert Stevenson is an unusual person. On one count he is driving, stubborn, proud, and ambitious. On the other, he is aware, sensitive, and a natural leader. Where this combination takes him is solely in his hands.

Rabies in bats?
These words have a sinister sound, and a growing number of people in Utah County are expressing concern over the so-called rabies "epidemic" flying along the Wasatch Front this year.

But are there fangs in the scare? Do the proliferating number of news stories about the current hydrophobia threat add up to paranoia, overkill, or is there truely a source of concern for the average citizen?

The bat is taking a bum rap in the rabies scare, says Dr. Hal L. Black, assistant professor of Indian Education and Zoology at ByU and a local authority on the tiny flying mammal. "The situation is being blown out of proportion."

Professor Black — also known as BYU's "batman" — says rabies in bats is not alarming to anyone who knows anything about bats. "It's as natural to bats as war is to people," he declares.

The BYU zoologist, who has been conducting research on bats throughout the world since 1968, explains that rabies virus is endemic in the bat population, "It's always there," Dr. Black adds, "but only one-half of one per cent of 1,000 bats may be actually

Biased sample

Utah scientists concerned about the incidence of rabies in bats are not worried, Dr. Black continues. "Right now we have a biased sample. The bats accessible to people are the sick ones. It's a lot like going to the hospital to see how many people in the population are a part of his research.

The professor says he has handled bats in Africa, North America and Mexico, and in some 4,000 captured and held in his hands, none appeared to be sick.

"Only one person has died this year from rabies contracted from a bat, and that was in Maryland," Dr. Black adds. "Since 1951, only 10 deaths have been caused by insectivorous bats, the kind that live in Utah. You take a bigger chance of getting killed by stepping into a bathtub."

So why the scare? Why are people suddenly finding bats

The young zoologist gets angry when he hears public officials making statements that the bat population is on the increase. "There are no begin migrating to their winter hibernation sites. Suddenly, they become more visable to

According to Black, a female bat bears one offspring per year, which grows to maturity in four weeks. This happens around mid-July or later, depending on the species. There are 18 species of bats in Utah, none of which are of the blood-sucking vampire variety. At maturity, the young bats join the adults and become transient, flying from place to place, seeking suitable dwellings as they begin migration to caves in the warmer climates in southern Utah, adjacent states, Mexico and Central America.

"But favorable habitats are limited," Dr. Black explains, "so the bats reside in attics, trees and other conspicuous places in town. That's why people suddenly see them this time of the year."

Althea Bailey, chief microbiologist at the State Division of Health in Salt Lake City, says only 12 rabid bats have been picked up along the Wasatch Front this summer (as or Sept. 1). And "an incredible mumber are being brought in for

Professor Black says a test for rabies in a bat may turn up positive, but this doesn't necessarily mean the animal is sick. "Bats can contract the disease and recover," he explains. "Tests prove this. Others will simply carry the virus in their systems and never get sick." If one of the carriers bites you, Dr. Black says, it does not necessarily mean you would contract the disease. "No rabid bats have been found in the unincorporated parts of Utah County," asserts Wayne Sechrest, director of the De part ment of Animal Registration. But two positive cases have shown up in the Provo-Springville areas, says Dr. J. Alan Thomas of the Utah State University Branch Veterinary Lab in Provo. Both cases involve exposure of bats to cats. One bat had rabies; the

Not all bite

Not all bats bite, Dr. Black claims, but some do, and the rabies virus can be carried in the saliva. "This is why people and animals are in some degree of danger," Dr. Black adds. "However, an aggressive state in infected bats is uncommon. When it is exhibited, the bat will bite both animate and in a n im a te, objects Since rabies is known to be in the local bat population at least in a small degree, both Dr. Black and Dr. Bailey warn that a dead bat should never be picked up.

"A person with a smal scratch or an open wound could get the saliva of a dead bar mixed into his system," Dr Bailey says. "If the bat has rabies, then that person it Dead bats dangerous

FIRST

He spoke with great relish of his days at the University of Utah Law School, appeared to enjoy meeting folks from his district and praising their efforts, and often spoke highly of the church and its leaders, as well as of BYU.

During committee and subcommittee meetings, he would converse with other Congressmen, who said during interviews later that they felt he was highly qualified and doing an effective job. They like him, apparently, and he would grin as they waved at each other in passing or chatted in the office building halls.

But when the arrest came and members of the press began to dig for details, hordes of rumors crept out from the woodwork.

Howe had previously been excommunicated on his mission, sources said. That was confirmed. But there were many other rumors which, despite extensive investigation, still remain unconfirmed, including:

—Was Howe dating a woman other than his wife while working as a government official in the Four Corners area? His wife flew into a rage when a KBYU reporter posed the question following a guilty verdict at Howe's second trial. So did his attorney.

"He's a good man," he wife said. "But it's questions like this that make it impossible for him to get a fair trial in Utah."

over to the House floor for a vote, or meeting momentarily with his staff. He often missed lunch, and was not above bumming a ride to work when his wife needed their only car, a light-blue 1975 Oldsmobile Cutlass.

He stayed in the office until 6 or 7 p.m., which is not unusual, but would also attend party dinners and offering a glass of orange juice.

But both the congressman and Mrs. Howe, as well as their attorney, showed a definite desire to get back at the reporter. "Who are you and who do you represent?" they asked repeatedly. All three Salt Lake City television stations carried reports on the episode.

Howe even talked earnestly about how people back home have misconceptions about life in Washington—senators and congressmen don't ride around in limousines all day smoking cigars, he would say. And he was right. He loved to relate how a neighbor asked him if he had used his political influence to get a stop light

His wife, Marlene, would often accompany him. She spent a lot of time in the office. One morning in their home, which was full of the smell of burnt toast, he joked with her over breakfast. It was not the first time Howe claimed he was being unfairly treated by the press. Nor was it the first time Mrs. Howe lost her temper. Following a report that only one sponsor was planning to attend a fund-raising dinner in D.C., Mrs. Howe and the banquet chairwoman called the reporter on the phone to chastize him, disputing his story. Her statements were reported in another story the next day. (Several hundred Democrats eventually turned out for the dinner, but not until the two women had called many of them personally asking for support. Even then, many came for only a few minutes.) During Howe's initial campaign for election, Mrs. Howe was known as a bane to reporters, often demanding expanded coverage for her husband and complaining if she did not get it. Some have theorized that it was she, and not her husband, who made the decision not to resign, that in fact she is the ambition factor in the decision to fight to the bitter end. That, too, however, is only speculation. WELCOME BACK STUDENTS!!! installed on their street. "I later found out it was a city councilman on the same block who did it," he would chuckle. It was one of his favorite stories. In short, Allan T. Howe was and is simply a man. Whatever action he has taken will never be understood completely, for no one will ever know entirely what it was like to be in his place, confronted with the obstacles that faced him. Juries may make rulings, courts may decide and finally the memory of all the scandals and accusations will fade away. But the man, guilty or not, torn by trials only to be unremembered in future years, will remain until he dies, even if alone with his family and his memories. WELCOME BACK TO

HOWE Bringing Allan

WASHINGTON, D. C. — Before the night of June 12, Rep. Allan T. Howe was just a busy freshman congressman, working long hours in the Longworth House Office Building on Capitol Hill.

A mong fellow Democrats, he was known as a successful debutant, who had even been asked to act as temporary chairman of a committee during a roll-call is vote, something which is fairly rare in the Congressional power shuffle.

He had many political friends, was building considerable influence in the party for a newcomer, and seemed to know the rules Washington society, both social and political. He seemed a shoo-in for reelection in November.

See Related Story on page 24

Then he was arrested. A shocked national capital, already embroiled in the sex scandal of Elizabeth Ray and Rep. Wayne Hays, D-Ohio, was surprized again. In the House Press Gallery, the conversation may have been typical of that among Washington residents only slightly familiar with the LDS Church.

wryly, "I didn't even know they had prostitutes in Salt Lake City."
"They don't," a colleague responded. "They only have decoys." The conversation then centered around whether or not Howe was Mormon. "Didn't he go on a mission for his church?" one of the press staff members queried. "Prostitutes in Salt Lake City?" one reporter smiled ryly, "I didn't even know they had prostitutes in Salt

Among members of the church, the reaction was different. Whether or not Howe was guilty, many of them wondered incredulously how such a thing could have happened at such a time, and why the name of the church had to be included in the Washington Post's front page coverage of the event.

After the arrest, Howe could not be found for two days. His office did not know where he was, or at least he aides would not say, other than he had returned to Washington. He had been on the news Sunday, interviewed by CBS. He had met with his staff, but no statements were being made, other than the original one, which claimed that he had been the victim of "some sort of frame-up."

of frame-up."

He had somehow disappeared. Utah correspondents in Washington speculated that he might have taken a plane home to consider what to do. Bob Meldrum, a BYU Political Science intern working for Howe's office, found himself inundated with questions from fellow participants in the BYU's Washington Seminar Program. The Desert News Washington Correspondent, Gordon White, spent an afternoon at National and Dulles Airports, checking license plate numbers on cars to see if Howe's was there. It was not.

He then drove to Howe's home in Arlington, Va., and watched it for several hours. No one entered or left.

It was not until the next week that the Congressman resurfaced in Salt Lake City, repeating the soon-to-become familiar statement that he had been the victin of a set-up, and that he would wait until his trial to tell in full his side of the story. What has happened since that time has been making headlines ever since. But the controversy-torn Allan Howe who has since cried unfair trial and the Allan Howe of early summer are not entirely the same person. Some short glimpses into his life, both on and off Capitol Hill prior to the night of his run-in with decoy prostitutes in Salt Lake, may help to bring into focus how he was, before his arrest, representing his constituents.

Howe was not famous for coming to work early. Unlike some of his colleagues, who come to the Hill at 7 a.m., Howe would show up for work about 9:10 a.m. But almost from the moment he arrived he was rushing, trailing aides and assistants behind him as he ran from meeting to meeting, down the hall to the elevator to trot

The city never took him up on the proposal, but undaunted, Liggett continued to cast about for ways to make his mark on the world by marking T-shirts. Capitalizing on the two attempts on President Ford's life in California, he printed a T-shirt with the motto: "Don't Register Guns, Register Californians."

Liggett first became involved with printing last fall when he began selling business and office

President Ford was sent one of the shirts, but it was returned a few weeks later with a letter from the White House stating that the president was not allowed to accept it as a possible endorsement could be "I decided after several months," he says," that I could do my own printing instead of going through an established house, and could have a good time and learn a lot in the process."

Initially, he began printing bumper stickers. His first two stickers were: "Ask me, I'm L D S' and "B Y U Linestanderinner."

It was when he expanded his business to T-shirts that he came up with the idea to help New York City.

The best way to sell something is to offer something with emotional impact, he says, "so it was profitable to me to try to help save New York City." The only way to appeal to the public is to create slogans that Provo citizens and students can relate to, he adds.

Hoping to appeal to BYU students with housing problems, Liggett came up with

By MIKE FOLEY Monday Magazine Writer

A group of BYU students, graduates and faculty/staff recently returned from a month of filming and acting in "The Moon light Express," a feature-length, Hollywood-style movie for Tumblewood Productions, Inc., of Dodge City, Kansas.
Filmed entirely on location, "The Moonlight Express" is a nostalgic look into the 1930s era of Bonnie and Clyde, bathtub gin and the Great Depression. It is about a boy, his father (the sheriff), his friend (one of the bankrobbers) and a secret hiding place (an old abandoned railroad car). The film depicts the love between the boy and his father and the relationship of the leader of a gang and his younger brother.

Private project

"This was a private project, not a BYU production, which gave our students the opportunity to work with a professional film company," says Wallace Barrus of the Communications Department. "Our students learned more in that one month than they could ever learn in a semester's worth of classes."

"The Moonlight Express," "The Moonlight Express," began with the dream of David Carter, a former branch president in Dodge City, Kan, and assistant manager of a local theater. "I grew sick of R-rated movies," Carter says. "I wanted to produce a good family movie."

Ron

Carter convinced other Dodge City businessmen to join his venture and a script was written. Carter visited BYU in 1974 and talked with Barrus about his film. Barrus has more than 21 years of movie-making

FOUR SEASONS CONTROVERSY

BY DONNA ROUVIERE Monday Magazine Editor

Last spring, more than 150 angry citizens banded together, raised $1,000, and filed a lawsuit against Provo City. The equally angry city fathers responded with a motion for dismissal of the suit, a counterclaim and charges the the citizens were

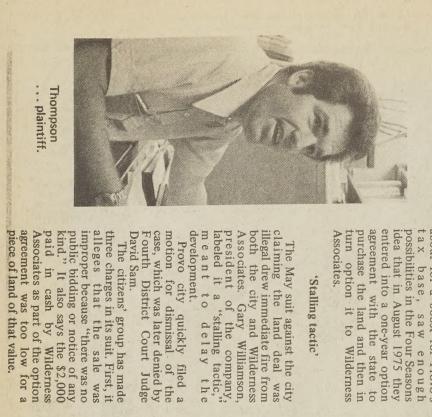

Scores of others crammed Forest Service hearings to overflowing, testifying vehemently on all sides of the issue in question. The Forest Service received in excess of 200 letters from people expressing similar opinions.

Meanwhile, city planners pore over revisions of preliminary plans, and congressional staffers in Washington D. C. carefully examine a Senate bill which Forest Service officials say might have a significant effect on the dispute in Provo.

As the Four Seasons plan to build a ski development in Provo's backyard — undoubtedly the most controversial proposal to hit the city in many a year — seemed to be approaching nearer to reality, its opponents and proponents began this summer to firm up their battlelines.

Citizens' Committee

Critics of the development, accusing the city commission of being unresponsive to their concerns, organized in May under the name of Provo Citizens' Committee to fight city hall in court.

Four leaders in the group—Jay Strange, Duane Horton, Frank Willis and Paul Thompson—are listed as plaintiffs in the Fourth District Court suit.

"We originally organized to elect (city Commissioner) Earl Wignall," explaines Horton.

"We were concerned that things were not going right in city hall and Earl said he would investigate Four Seasons and form an opinion."

Wignall joined the other commission members in supporting Four Seasons shortly after his election last year, but the citizens' group wasn't satisfied with his assessment of the project and filed the suit.

Replying to the charge that no public bidding was held on the land, the city's motion says, "There is no statutory procedure set out in the statutes of this state declaring what, if any, procedures must be followed by a city in disposing of its property."

Ellis says the state has no law requiring the city to open property for public bid. He also claims there is no court precedent for requiring bids.

Asked about a recent case in which an injunction was issued against the city of Sandy in connection with the sale of city property that was to be sold without taking bids, Ellis said the case would have no effect on the Four Seasons suit.

In the Sandy case, the judge interpreted a state statute requiring land to be disposed of for the good and benefit of the people as meaning there must be a public bid on it.

Value change

The lawsuit centers around a complicated land deal between the state, Provo City and Wilderness Associates, the developers. Wilderness Associates wants to build the base site to the resort on 87.5 acres of former state hospital land in east Provo.

The land was declared surplus by the Utah Department of Social Services. The second charge declares that the city knew Wilderness Associates' proposed use of the land would require rezoning of the property. A zoning change would double the appraised value of the land, the suit states.

The land was indeed rezoned following the granting of the option to Four Seasons, but the city denies that the value of it was changed by the rezoning. "Any assumption that the state The state mental health board has been unhappy about the land deal, since an adjacent tract of land was sold by the LDS church to a private developer for $50,000 an acre, according to Gordon Hall, state mental hospital administrator. The land was originally appraised by William L. Christensen, under a state-city agreement. He appraised one parcel at $10,000 and acre and another at $15,000. A third parcel of 19 acres was swapped for 40 acres of city land on the mountainside.

The 40 acres was valued at by the Utah Department of Social Services, but the state refused to sell it directly to Wilderness Associates.

"The state wanted to sell it to a municipality so they could have some control of it," says city attorney Glen Ellis.

The city fathers, casting about for a boost for Provo's tax base, saw enough possibilities in the Four Seasons idea that in August 1975 they entered into a one-year option agreement with the state to purchase the land and then in turn option it to Wilderness Associates.

The city said in its dismissal motion the first allegations "are not good faith allegations and indicate either an intentional misrepresentation of the transaction or abominable ignorance of the facts..."

"Substantial public interest was raised and every interested person was given ample opportunity to present his view to the city, and a full, complete and forthright disclosure" of the transaction was made, the motion says. The plaintiffs claim that if land appraisals were made on the best and highest use of the land, it would bring in as much as $75,000 an acre. Included in papers submitted to the court was an affadavit signed by a real estate expert, Robert L. Jacobson, who said that if the land were rezoned within the same residential zoning that the land adjacent to it on the west is zoned, it would be worth $60,000 to $65,000 an acre.

Wildred Higashi, director of the state mental health division, told Monday Magazine when it looked like the city was not going to meet the terms of the first option, the state considered negotiating a new contract for $1 million, which would have covered the cost of several buildings on the hospital property was worth more than the appraised fair market value is purely speculative," the dismissal motion says.

Ellis says there is no evidence that changing the zoning on the land would change the value of it. The land was rezoned mostly multiple housing zoning before the change, he says, which was similar to the present planned community zoning. Worth more?

The plan to build a ski resort in the mountains east of Provo, long known as the Four Seasons project, now has a new name.

"On June 3, 1976, the Board of Directors of Wilderness Associates voted unanimously to change the name of the entire resort from Four Seasons to Heritage Mountain," Wilderness Associates president Gary Williamson said in a July 6 letter to the Forest Service.

"Obviously, the component word 'mountain portion of the resort being approved by the Forest Service," the letter says. "For this reason it is not the proponent's intention to publicly announce this name until such time as appropriate within the Forest Service approval process."

The name has been legally reserved through the Secretary of State's office and will be formally activiated when the Federal permit for the land is granted.

From the root name will come such titles as "Heritage Mountain Ski Resort," "Heritage Mountain Cultural Center," "Heritage Mountain Ski Shop," and the "Racquet Club of Heritage Mountain."

The name change, the letter says, is the result of a year-long discussion on how to best protray the resort's central theme.

"The theme— around which the entire resort is built— is the cultural and natural resource heritage of the West and the Wasatch Range and, in general, the heritage of the West and the Rocky Mountains," the letter continues. "Of course, it is realized that this name does not relate to any existing geography or mapnomenclature," the letter says.

It adds that the Forest Service may wish to consider incorporating the new name into the final Environmental Impact Statement to facilitate the transition to the new name.

organizers employed the use of various campus clubs and departments to help in the preparations.

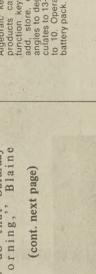

BYU's Physical Plant was to haul the whitewash up the side of the mountain. The night before, the Young Men were to mix the solution. The Amateur Radio Club and ROTC were going to provide communications between the top and bottom. Sound services set up huge speakers near the base of the mountain so that music could be played while the students worked. Ambulance services were provided for the usual eyeburns, splashes of lime and scrapes. Last year's Y whitewashing saw 150 injuries, while this year there were only 80.

More students than ever before attended the white washing project. Although 4,000 students were expected to turn out, the estimated participation was somewhere around 3,000. That's about how many Y Day buttons were given out, one Y Day official said. "Mostly, I would say there wasn't anything better for those students to do that Saturday morning," Blaine

Worthless land

The letter referred to is from Max C. Elliott, vice president and manager of First Security Bank in Provo. It states that the bank has committed itself for a period of 60 days to loan Wilderness Associates $617,300 to purchase the state land.

Elliott is also a member of the city's financial advisory committee on Four Seasons, to which a financial status report on the project was submitted.

With the letter from Elliott as assurance, the state took invested funds which the utilities companies pay to Provo as part of the city budget and bought the land outright from the state.

"We're waiting now for the state to give us clear title," Grange says. The title will be given to Wilderness Associates as soon as the city gets it and receives a check from the Withdrawing the city funds from investment to buy the land has resulted in about $100 a day in lost interest, according to Ellis. The city has filed a motion for a countersuit against the Provo Citizens' Committee to regain the interest, plus $50,000 in general damages.

Wilderness Associates has also filed a countersuit, claiming that the suit has cost them $50,000 a month in interest on the land and also asking for $250,000 in general and $55,000 in general and $55,000 in punitive damages.

Both the city and the developers claim the citizens' group has interfered with their contract rights and slandered their title to the land. The plaintiffs also submitted a letter to the court from Christensen to the city commission in which he valued the total state hospital land at $1,020,000. They have charged that the $613,400 selling price in the land deal was too low because of the Christensen appraisal.

Ellis claims, however, that the appraised value included the two parcels of land not in the land deal. The Christensen appraisal of the two parcels actually sold would thus be about $657,000. Since the city was given eight acres of land outright for roads, the value of the land actually sold would be about $657,000. Since the city was given eight acres of land outright for roads, the value of the land actually sold would be about $613,000.

"This case," the dismissal motion sum up, "is patently an effort to delay and stall and cloud the issue and possibly even jeopardize the financing capability of the project through a fallacious lawsuit."

As the Aug. 15 expiration date for the option approached, Wilderness Associates informed the city that because of the lawsuit they were running it into problems coming up with the $613,400.

"We asked for a 30-day extension from the state," Mayor Grange explains" but on

Members of the citizens' group have termed the suits a "scare tactic."

"It's a nuisance suit," says Horton. "An effort to intimidate us. It is a cold, calculated effort to sap our willpower and resources."

Williamson has charged that the plaintiffs in the suit are innocent people who are being used by "unscrupulous people" with vested interests. "I have not had one person tell me I'm making a mistake," Horton counters. "If I'm being used it is by the citizens of Provo."

The citizens group, Horton claims, is composed of about 150 citizens who contributed $1,000 to the lawsuit. The largest contribution was around $100, he says.

Horton admits the land deal is only one of many objections the group has to the resort. "There are as many motives as there are people," he says.

favoring the project and about 90 against it, says Jerry Gelock, recreation chief for the local Forest Service office. About 60 other letters have expressed interest in the project but included no opinion, he says.

The response has not been overwhelming for a project of this scope, however. "In fact, it's been a little low," Gelock

Brighton Ski Bowl, of Salt Lake City, wrote: "Such a large ski resort in the Utah market seems to us to be totally unrealistic," and "one does not have to look far to find four out of six local Wasatch ski areas with money problems."

"The Forest Service is obviously being deluged by selfish individuals posing as environmentalists who are bound and determined to keep others from enjoying our area and natural resources," Crandall said.

Geology problems,

State Rep. Willard Hale Gardner, a former stockholder in Ski Park City West, wrote: "If Four Seasons could guarantee the money to complete the project with all the environmental safeguards and without relying on operational profits I would not oppose the development. Under the present conditions I believe the Forest Service will be doing the citizens of Provo a disservice if they approve the application." The Utah Department of Natural Resources also wrote to express concern over geologically unstable areas of the Four Seasons land.

The draft EIS included studies of the sociological, economic and environmental impacts of the project on the area as well as several possible alternatives for development. It did not include the Forest Service's decision on whether the project would go through, however.

Gardner's View

That decision will be released in a final EIS which is now at the printers and is scheduled for release around the first week in October.

Louis E. Crandall, a stockholder in the Four Seasons project, wrote: "The slate Canyon area is the very heart of the Four Seasons development and is a vital element to the success of the project." Crandall quoted a letter from Willie Shaeffler, ski coach of the Winter Olympics in 1968 in which he said, "I had a great deal of opportunity to survey similar areas for the purpose of staging the Winter Olympics in Canada. I am even more enthusiastic about your area because of the variety of terrain and especially the terrain for beginners."

One source in the Ogden regional office even went so are as to say the project will be approved with some restrictions on development in Slate Canyon, but Gelock, the local official, refuses to comment at all on the decision.

Even if the Forest Service gives the project the go-ahead, there will be a thirty-day period bet ween the release of the decision and the issuing of a final permit, to allow time for any appeals, Gelock says.

The developers will also have to prove ability to finance the project before receiving the permit. This will include disclosure to the Forest Service of a list of stockholders, which Gelock says will not be made available to the public.

Aside from the decision, the final EIS will likely involve the estimated skier demand in the area.

The draft EIS showed a critical gap between the results of a study done by Four Seasons and a Utah State University Foundation study done under a Forest Service contract.

Both studies maintain there will continue to be an increase in skiers through 1990, but different rates of growth are cited. The USU study has been up dated and Wilderness Associates had conducted another study which will be included in their response to the EIS.

However, the new analyses have not done much to close the gap, Gelock says. "They're a little closer, but to be perfectly candid, not much," he said.

Haskell Bill

Meanwhile, a bill sponsored by Sen. Floyd K. Haskell of Colorado and passed by the Senate this summer may have an effect on Four Seasons if the House of Representatives okays it. The bill simply provides that any ski development of more than 3,000 acres proposed for federal lands must be approved by Congress. If passed in time, it "would have a definite effect" on Four Seasons, which involves 7,800 acres, said Gelock.

By JOHN WISE Monday Magazine Writer

Readers of BYU's Daily Universe on Friday, Sept. 7, 1973 read of the upcoming "Y Day" as a day filled with fun and excitement. The traditional Y Day was to be highlighted by whitewashing the school's large block "Y," followed by other activities in the Reaction was immediate from studentbody officers and Y Day organizers. ASBYU President Mark Reynolds, expressing regret at the project's failure, called a press conference to discuss the situation with BYU's news media. Saying he was elected on a platform of returning to "traditional sentiments," he blamed the poor turnout on the early-morning hour the event was scheduled to begin and on lack of publicity.

The annual event has waned between many participants and too few to complete the project. The 200 students who showed up at the beginning of the 1973 school year didn't even attempt to pour the lime and water solution on the large block letter, as several lines of students in a "bucket brigade" must be able to form from the base of the mountain, where the lime vats are located, to the top of the letter.

After the 1973 failure, student body officers and organizers decided to appoint student wards to do the project, with the aid of helicopters to bring the lime up the side of the mountain.

The issue of apathy toward whitewashing the Y was not new, however. As early as 1956, warned students that unless more participation in the event were shown, Y Day would be canceled permanently.

however, the organizers took no chances on the early-morning hour or the publicity. The starting time for the event was set at 8 a.m. Saturday morning. This was to accommodate the well-known student habit of sleeping in. The event was announced at student assemblies and on posters throughout Provo, and by spot radio announcements. A group of 30 people was chosen to go from door to door in student housing to inform and remind the students of the event.
